

Is It Really the Machine, or Is It the Human?

A Reflection on Humanity, Technology, and Choice

Is It Really the Machine, or Is It the Human?

Is it truly the machine? Or is it the human?

Is the machine really the reason life has become dull, or is it the human who has allowed it to strip the colors from life by choice?

Is it truly the machine that has taken control of human minds, or is it the human who has begun chasing comfort, even when it comes to something as fundamental as using their own mind?

Is it really the machine that now helps humans with every aspect of their lives, even understanding and managing their emotions, or is it the human who no longer wishes to take responsibility for their own life and feelings, or to endure the effort required to understand them, work through them, and learn how to deal with them?

Is it truly the machine that is taking human jobs, or is it the human who has lost the passion to develop themselves?

Is it really the machine that has made life more difficult, or is it the human who has forgotten how to live it?

Is it truly the machine that has made humans passive, or is it the human who has handed over the reins of their own life?

The human mind is extraordinarily powerful. After all, it was the human mind that invented the machine.

Human beings can reach remarkable heights as long as they are willing to pursue them and believe in their own potential.

In our time, there are people who do not struggle with technology in the same way as many others do. This is simply because they treat it for what it is: a machine. This stands in contrast

In our time, there are people who do not struggle with technology in the same way as many others do. This is simply because they treat it for what it is: a machine. This stands in contrast to those who treat it as though it were human, until they themselves become its instruments.

The strength of human beings in the age of machines lies in their determination to keep moving forward and in their refusal to surrender to the temporary comfort machines offer in different aspects of life. To feel truly alive, we must be willing to put in the effort to develop ourselves and our lives, and to understand our emotions and problems. We must not simply hand them over to a machine in exchange for ready-made, mechanical and problems. We must not simply hand them over to a machine in exchange for ready-made, mechanical solutions to problems that are deeply personal to us—problems we understand better than anything else because, quite simply, we are the ones living through them.

Human beings, with all their complexity and ideas, are unique. They possess a distinctive beauty and spirit that they bring to life itself. Their creativity knows no bounds.

That is why we must hold firmly to our determination as we face the age of machines. There is nothing wrong with using them, of course, but we must use them within the limits of what they were created to do.
